Piranha are members of the Serrasalminae subfamily of Characins, which includes the tiger shark and the piranha. The Characins are a type of fish that are mostly found in South America and Africa and are well recognized for their Tetra-like appearance. The Piranha and its near cousin, the Pacu, are members of the Serrasalminae subfamily of Tetras, which includes the Piranha. These fish are native to South America and share a great deal in common with one another in terms of both look and behavior.

Generally speaking, Piranha are enormous fish, albeit the vast majority of Piranha species are not quite as large as the vast majority of Pacu species. Species as little as four inches (10 centimeters) in length, and species as large as twelve inches (30 centimeters) in length are found in the ocean (30cm).

Piranha have a lifespan ranging from four to fifteen years, depending on the species and the level of care provided (larger varieties tend to live longer).
